Doubles Tip of the Month

Teams That Use The Australian Formation

These teams use the effective “Australian” formation by putting their net player in the cross-court position from their returner instead of the down-the-line position. This formation works very well and should be used more by all teams. The main reason it works is because most returns are played cross-court. Therefore, we get very grooved and master that shot quickly. The Australian formation takes away the returner's most common shot and forces them to try the lower percentage down-the-line return.

Seven tactics to try:

1. Lob the return cross-court. This is a classic response to this formation and if executed properly, can really cause a lot of switching and confusion to your opponents.
2. Pick a target and stick to it. One reason that this formation works so well is because the returner often attempts to “outsmart” the net player and changes his mind in mid stroke.
3. Reposition where you stand to return serve. Their server has moved right next to the center mark and you should adjust your position accordingly.
4. Try to nail a few returns cross-court at the net player. This works because they expect that you will always try the down-the-line return. It also lets you hit the shot that you hit the most and are the best at – the cross-court return.
5. If you are having trouble, have your partner drop back to the baseline. Being stubborn and not changing are what these teams want you to do.
6. Tell your partner where you intend to hit the return. This is a good idea anyway, but is really a necessity when playing against this formation.

Look excited about facing this formation. When a team uses this, they are having trouble with the normal alignment.

Congratulations to Ellie Gerlach who partnered with Emily Mallory to win the Girls Doubles High School State Championship for Christian Academy. Ellie also made the Girls All-State Team.

Congratulations to Dylan Gerlach who was named to the Boys All-State Team. Dylan was a Boys Doubles standout who advanced to the Semi-Finals of the Boys Doubles High School State Championships.

July is filled with many events. July 10th boasts a Mixed Friday Night Social. Two pizza parties are planned for July 17th and 31st. Finally on July 26th we have a Little Skills Competition. If you have any questions feel free to contact me at 254-7383 or CShulhafer@lakeforestgolf.com.
